18. "It seems to me that it is hardly grand enough. How would this sound: 'The Partridge Nest was discovered by Harry, who sailed in the ship Grasshopper from Bumble Bee Point on the sixteenth of October, one thousand eight hundred and fifty-eight. It is well wooded, the soil is fertile, and the principal exports[16] are pitch, tar, turpentine, and lumber?'"

19. They kept along close to the shore, and, turning the southern point of the promontory,[17] came to a little gulf or arm of the lake that set back into the land. The banks were here perpendicular and rocky, and the water full of lilies. Emma made a little sketch of the lilies, and the rocks, and the bushes about them, and when she got home she finished the drawing. Here it is.

20. They called this place the Gulf of Lilies. In the farther end was a cave made by the wearing away of the bank under the shelf-like rocks that formed the roof. The cave was large, and high enough to take in the whole Grasshopper easily. The sunlight reflected from the water fell upon the roof and sides, making it light as day within. Harry threw the sounding-line, and found the depth half a fathom. As they sat enjoying this newly-found retreat, Emma spied some half-hidden characters[18] cut in the stone on one side. Clearing away the moss, they found the figure of a cross upon a heart, and below, "Bernard, 1780."
