fifties and he's been dead about forty-five years, so he'd be up in the nineties now.

P: So both your mother's family, the Fuller family, and your father's family were Georgians?

W: Yes, that's right.

P: They were married where?

W: I believe they were married in Savannah. My mother was a teacher and she met my father when he was maybe on the school board or something--there was some connection there. He came to the school.

P: So he graduated from Mercer? He went back to Savannah which was his home community and began a law practice there?

W: Uh-huh. Yes, that's right.

P: Was his father also an attorney?

W: His father was a lawyer. I don't remember how many generations there were, but I remember on the maternal side there were preachers, preachers and lawyers.

P: On the paternal side, do you remember whether your grandfather and your father practiced together?

W: No, they did not.

P: They did not. Was your father in politics in Georgia; you said he was on the school board?

W: Well, oh, just minor politics, yes. He always had a great ~~deal of~~ interest in politics. He
