VACATION RAILROAD TRAVEL

During recent years the railroads have lost a great deal of passenger business owing to the competition of automobiles. But if they get after that business in the right way, they can get much of it back.

The first step toward getting it back ,is to advertise their excursions and trips. They should describe the beauty spots and pleasant resorts along their routes, and inform the public about the trains running to these places and the expense of such trips.

Trains run on time, well cleaned and comfortable and airy and not too crowded cars, attention to the requests of passengers, supplies of cold water, good provisions for meals, are some of the things that attract people to railroad travel. Many of the leading automobile routes have become so crowded that rail travel could be increased if such travel was thoroughly advertised.

A POPULAR VOTE ON WAR

In a recent address, the United States Ambassador to England, Mr. Houghton, offered the suggestion that hereafter the leading nations of the world should individually agree that they would not go to war with any of the powers signing this agreement, until their people had decided to do so by popular vote. Mr. Houghton holds the view that the governments of the world have made a failure on the question of preventing war. The politicians and diplomats get involved in serious difficulties among themselves, and then they persuade the people of their respective countries that it is necessary for them to fight to preserve their rights and their national safety.

The masses of the people do not know much about what such a war is for. But they are led along by the excitement of the moment, and they throw themselves into battle in an unthinking way, and do themselves infinitely more harm than the good they get by fighting, at least in most cases.

Mr. Houghton's scheme calls for the assent of all the leading nations to such a project. Of course, if some nations did assent to this plan and some did not, those that did not agree to it would have an advantage if it came to a war, because they could start fighting first. But if they would all agree to this plan, the chances are 10 to 1 that there would be no more wars.

The people of one country rarely feel that they have any special quarrel with the people of neighbor countries. They may not like them, but it would seem as poor judgment to fight them, as to go out and fight their neighbors living on their street.

If such an agreement as that suggested by the ambassador could be accomplished, it would remove the most terrible curse and burden that rests on the human race. Such proposals are likely more and more to arouse the interest of thoughtful people, who feel that the world has suffered far too long from the burdens of war and armament.

TOURIST MANNERS

Much could be said by way of suggestion to people who are starting out during these summer weeks, to take automobile tours. In the main they will be courteous and agreeable, but the manners of some need correction.

The first duty of the tourist is to so handle his car and co-operate with the rest of the traffic as to promote everyone's saftey. He may wish to travel at a daredevil rate of speed. But he has no right to take hazards for his own passengers and those whom he meets.

His next duty is to be considerate of the residents and landowners along the way. If he stops by the roadside to take his lunch, he should remember that a carelessly thrown cigaret or poorly extinguished campfire may spread into near-by forests and destroy the beauty of the country and the property on which people depend for their living. Also when he leaves his picnic spot, he should clean up every particle of rubbish. He would be angry if some picnic party camped on his front lawn and left their dirty refuse there. Let him be equally careful about the good appearance of property which is valued by its owners.

Some motorists travel in a swaggering way, speaking contemptuously of the towns they visit, the hotels they put up at, the roads they traverse. It is well to remember that they are the guests of the states and cities through which they travel. Let them express appreciation for everything desirable, and be courteously silent about undesirable features. In that way they will convey the impression that cultured people are produced by our commonwealth. But of course let them not forget to say some good words about their home town whenever they go. Judicious advertising is always legitimate and necessary.

You like to live in a prosperous town. Prosperity, like charity, begins at home. Every dollar you spend out of town is a check on your town's prosperity. Trade at home.

Your town depends upon the money spent in it by its citizens for its growth and prosperity. For a prosperous city—trade at home.

The size of your taxation depends upon the wealth of your community. Increase this wealth and reduce taxation by trading at home.
