

from him. I think some of the... some of the, some of the kinfolks were borrowing from him. I couldn't prove that because there's nobody definitely knows, but that is my general supposition that he, some of them were kind of borrowing from him. But the, but the salary itself, if you came to Florida many times you'd eat it up. You see, when we went to Congress in the, in '33, the base salary was only ten thousand dollars, and when we passed the economy bill they cut it to $7,500. But he only got once mileage to go to Washington. You got ten cents a mile for a thousand mile trip from here. So we got a hundred dollars. Well, you can imagine if you get invitations to come back to speak and all that. And so, but he didn't accumulate anything.

- K: I see. But you have heard that his brothers, or his family, would borrow money from him? Did you hear that they would...?
- P: That was my understanding that some of his family and others...
- K: ...they would ask for favors or try to get jobs or things like this.
- P: I don't, I don't know about getting a job, but, but my, it's a feeling and kind of the impression that he was helping his family. Some them now, some of them were not. But...
- K: I understand.
- P: But even with, without that he wouldn't have had much chance of accumulating...
- K: Right, especially if he had no...
- P: Yes, I went backwards.
- K: ...practice.
- P: I went backwards when I was at Congress. The, but I paid my own expenses and but I went, when the situation was tight and I knew to a certain extent what I was getting into, and but I had, well I had about eighty acres of grove when I went to Congress and during the time I was at Congress I ate seventy of them up. I came back with ten.
- K: And glad to have the ten, I guess?
