

- ?: _____ and throw fresh meat over it, though, put it on the bite.
- M: That was just about all they did.
- ?: _____
- P: Kill a deer and....
- ?: Yeah, deer meat.
- ?: _____
- M: I have never heard for it, for snake bites, now, that I remember.
- ?: _____
- P: How about anything for toddlers if they have _____
- M: That _____ give whiskey or something if a child doesn't _____ and you had to stay in, you had to stay in the bed nine days and you had to take a dose of castor's oil, I mean, oil every morning, honey. You had to take that dose of castor oil every morning and you didn't get out of that bed for nine days and then you start _____ But I don't know that they'd ever, I hadn't ever heard anything for pain except for aspirin or something like that, you know. But you had to take that dose of castor oil and that baby had to have that band on his stomach, you know. He had to wear that till that naval _____ off. Nowadays they don't even put anything on it. So, they do everything different, now.
- ?: _____ course, I didn't care much no way. It's the air.
- ?: _____
- P: _____ sore throat.
- M: Onliest thing for sore throat was that turpentine. We'd use that for colds and sore throat and bad coughs. (Turpin-hydrate?) Oh, you want to know something else I forgot to tell you? Now this is to put a fried rag to you, now. That works. I don't care what nobody says, fried rag works, I'll vouch for that.
- P: Fried rag?
- M: Fried rag. You take beef taller, about the size of an egg and melt it in a pan, in a frying pan, or frying, you know, something that you can melt in, and then you'd add a teaspoon full of kerosene, a teaspoon full of turpentine.
- ?: That's it. That's what I say, too.
