

R: things of that sort.

P: Spices.

R: Spices, uh huh. And he had a big red bottle of Watkin's liniment and he has a white liniment, too, but that was the remedy at our house whether anything, any sore muscle or any of that.

P: It just rubbed on.

R: Rubbed on. Uh huh.

P: Did he come in a wagon or....

R: Well, when I remember he came in a car.

P: Okay. Let's see. High blood pressure?

R: None of my people have ever had that. I really don't know.

P: Insect bites of mosquito bites?

R: I don't know much about the bite, but I guess we were so accustomed to those that we just scratched it and let it go, but to keep mosquitoes out of the house when we didn't have screens, we would take a pan and put old rags, old clothes in it, you know, and put sulphur on it and before we'd go to bed at night put that in there where it would just smolder and smoke.

P: Uh huh. So you would set it on fire.

R: Uh huh, uh huh. Yes.

P: And you'd put it near the window or....

R: Put it, just put it out in the middle of the room and let it smoke and keep the mosquitoes, couldn't stand it, I guess, and you couldn't either hardly when you went in.

P: That's interesting. I haven't heard that.

Okay. What was your house like that you were born in and grew up in?

P: Well, the house that I grew up in, I think, was a typical farmhouse of that country. They had two big rooms, a hall through the middle and a chimney at either end. One room was a parlor and it had the organ in it and we had two fancy rockers in there and had a big fancy big wooden bedstead, high wooden bedstead and marble topped dresser and of course, you didn't go in there except maybe on Sunday or if you had company, why you went in there and sat in there in that room and then it had two, three bedrooms. Had a bedroom on the front porch, off the front porch was a bedroom. Then the kitchen had a kitchen and dining
