ADDRESS OF HON. F. E. HARRIS

At the Unveiling of the Confederate Monument Saturday, April 25

Dickson Chapter United Daughters of the Confederacy, Confederate Veterans, Ladies, Gentlemen and Fellow Citizens:

Holy writ proclaims that a "prophet is not without honor save in his own country and in his own household."

Stated in another form, it might be rendered thus: "A citizen is seldom honored in his own community and among his own people."

I am extremely proud of the fact that I form an exception to this very general rule.

The men and women of this community and especially the women have on many occasions been more than kind to me, and insist on honoring me more than my merits deserve.

I wish here and now to thank them for the partiality they have so uniformly shown me; and I want it to be distinctly known that I feel it no little honor in being selected to preside over a meeting of this significance.

We are assembled here to dedicate a monument to those who shouldered their muskets and showed a readiness to lay down their lives if need be at their country's call.

"Greater love," says the Good Book, "hath no man than to lay down his life for a friend," and to lay down one's life on the altar of one's country, is the world's conception of patriotism in its highest and most exalted form.

The act of participation in these ceremonies does not necessarily commit us to the glorification nor deification of war, nor is it our purpose to bequeath to the generations that are to follow after us the spirit or animus of war.

Life is full of paradoxes. We do things every day of our lives that we had rather not do—we chastise those we love best, not to stimulate in us the chastising spirit, but for the sole purpose that good may follow.

When we slay bird or beast, we rob a life that God created, but we do so with his sanction that a higher life may live. So in a defensive war, a war for the protection of the home and fireside, for the preservation of the higher ideals of government, for the survival of the great principles of freedom, we have the divine sanction, and the larger the sacrifice the more priceless the boon.

The spirit that animated these men to lay down their lives, if necessary, for a principle, which this monument is intended to consecrate, in the providence of God, still survives.

That war was for the exercise of the reserved rights guaranteed to the states under the constitution.

The exercise of these rights by the governors of the southern states at this very time, in a larger sense and a more wholesome manner than was ever before performed, and the very erection of these monuments to our sainted heroes all over our land are in themselves proof that those of us now living enjoy a larger measure of freedom and a greater tolerance of opinion than that possessed by any other nation at any other time in the world's history, and these truths tell us that the war drums of 1860 did not beat in vain.

Largely by virtue of that struggle this nation is stronger today in all the cardinal virtues ordained in its organic laws than it was when our forefathers consecrated it to the world as a child of freedom.

And in it all the women played a part, a large, a most conspicuous part.

Their part has been beautifully enshrined in verse:

Let me read you a story that is old, very old,
A story that has often been told and re-told,
And yet is as bright and as new as the sun,
Or the dew in the spring when the day is begun.

'Tis the story of women, fair women, and true,
Whose home is the southland, where skies are so blue,
Where the flowers bloom always, the birds ever sing,
And rewards are enjoyed that virtue can bring.

The South in her glory—before the long war
Came to scourge her and leave her with wound and with scar—
Was blessed with men gallant and women most fair,
Whose home was their watchword and loved ones their care.

When war came, and outrage, who bid the men go
And stand for their country in weal and in woe?

'Who waited and prayed for their loved ones away,
Consumed with their anguish and longing each day?

'Twas the women, God bless them, they stood for the right,
The men died in glory in the heat of the fight;

But the women, sore travelled in sorrow and want,
From the door fought the wolf, so grim and so gaunt.

Yet never a word of complaint could one hear,
From privation and want shed they never a tear,
And they worked for their own. But their warriors bold
Urged to fight for their homes, to have and to hold.

When the carnage was over and soldiers came back
To the remnants of homes in the enemy's track—

The Reason Why

We welcome small depositors and small borrowers is, that many of the best accounts which we now have, began little and grew big. We want to help others to do so.
