REMINISCENCES OF ROCKEFELLER

The Standard Oil King Gives His Impressions of Some Past Events

John D. Rockefeller, in a happy and optimistic vein, gives to the public in the first chapter of his "Random Reminiscences of Men and Events," his defense of the methods of the Standard Oil Company, his views of industrial combinations and corporation control, an appreciation of modern opportunity and some of the fulness of & Co., who are to publish Mr. Rockefeller's autobiography exclusively in America in World's Work, the October number of which contains Mr. Rockefeller's first article, announce that simultaneously it will be published in prominent periodicals in nearly every language. Paris, Le Matin, the English World's Work and Zur Guten Stunde are among the European publications which have secured foreign rights.

"Just how far any one is justified in keeping what he regards as his own private affairs from the public," says Mr. Rockefeller in telling why he has been induced to write his memoirs, "or in defending himself from attack, is a mooted point. If one talks about one's experiences there is a natural temptation to charge one with traveling the easy road to egotism; if one keeps silence, the inference of wrongdoing is sometimes even more difficult to meet, as it would then be said that there is no valid defense to be offered."

Defends His Old Friends

Besides leaving a record for his family and friends, Mr. Rockefeller says there is this reason: "If a truth of the things that have been said are true, then these dozens of able and faithful men who have been associated with me, many of whom have passed away, must have been guilty of grave faults. I am convinced that they have not been fully understood."

Mr. Rockefeller devotes about 2,000 words to the Standard Oil Company, whose "occasional" and "overzealous" employees he makes his scapegoat. He says:

"It would be surprising if in an organization which included a great number of men there should not be an occasional employee here and there who acted, in connection with the business or perhaps in conducting his own affairs, in a way which might be criticised. To judge the character of all the members of the organization itself by the actions of a few individuals would be manifestly unfair."

Of the charge that he forced his competitors to become his partners, "If it were true that I followed such tactics, I ask, would it have been possible to make such men lifelong companions?"

Mr. Rockefeller says he has "often wondered if the criticism which centered upon us did not come from the fact that we were among the first, if not the first, to work out the principle of direct selling to the users on a broad scale."

Says He Did Not Ruin His Rivals

Flatly he denies the oft-repeated charge as to the methods of developing the Standard's incomparable system of distribution and the elimination of competition. He says:

"This (working out the problems of direct selling) was done in a fair spirit and with due consideration for every one's rights. We did not ruthlessly attempt to ruin it by cutting prices or instituting a spy system." The problem, Mr. Rockefeller explains, was to get the advantages of the "utmost markets of all lands—we needed volume."

"It was never our purpose to interfere with a dealer who had adequately cultivated his field of operations, but when we saw a new opportunity or a new place for extending the sale by further and effective facilities we made it our business to provide them."

In developing so rapidly the Standard could not always recruit its men for higher positions from its ranks. The methods resorted to by some of its employees which have made Mr. Rockefeller's great industrial machine the most condemned if not the most hated of trusts he emphatically repudiates.

Next paragraph so dam pied I don't no what to do with it. SHORTY.

"I am proud of the record," says Mr. Rockefeller, writing of the fact that the Standard's foreign trade for many years has brought weekly into this country more than a million dollars gold, all from the products produced from American labor."

Tells of Early Struggles

"The early struggles of the oil business, including the difficulties to procure capital for development of an industry then considered extra hazardous, are told in the Oil King's simple, lucid English. He writes just as he speaks, with excellent choice of words, and there is none of the verbosity that is a fault of many autobiographers."

Besides the working out of its development plans unchecked by panic, the splendid treatment of the 60,000 employees and the absence of any important strikes among them, Mr. Rockefeller calls attention to its financing.

"Another thing to be remembered about this so-called octopus is that there has been no 'water' introduced into its capital (perhaps we felt that oil and water would not have mixed); nor in all these years has any one had to wait for money which the Standard owed."

Of the government, now demanding its corporate life, the head of Standard Oil speaks thus appreciatively: "One of our greatest helpers has been the State Department in Washington. Our Ambassadors and Ministers and Consuls have aided to push our way into new markets to the utmost corners of the earth."

Mr. Rockefeller reiterates his oft-made assertion that the Standard's success "is not due to any one man, but to the multitude of able men who are working together." "If, in place of these directors, the business were taken over and run by any one but experts, I would sell my interests for any price I could get."

He promises to deal with the Standard Oil Company's origin and early plans in his later chapters.

Under the heading "The Modern Corporation" Mr. Rockefeller gives the views he expressed before the Industrial Commission in 1899, when he suggested Federal incorporation and control, and in lieu of that State legislation as nearly uniform as possible. "I still feel," he now says, "as I did in 1899."

Sees Great Things In Future

"I am far from believing that this (corporation regulation) will adversely affect the individual," says Mr. Rockefeller dwelling on "The New Opportunities." "The great economic we are entering will give splendid opportunity to the young man of the future. * * * I am naturally an optimist, and when it comes to a statement of what our people will accomplish in the future I am unable to express myself with sufficient enthusiasm."

Mr. Rockefeller throws out this advice: "The great business interests will, I hope, so comport themselves that foreign capital will consider it a desirable thing to hold shares in American companies. It is for Americans to see that foreign investors are well and honestly treated so that they will not regret purchases of our securities. I may speak thus frankly, because I am an investor in many American enterprises, but a controller of none (with one exception, and that a company that has not been much of a dividend payer), and I like all the rest, an dependent upon the honest and capable administration of the industries. I firmly and sincerely believe that they will be so managed."

Discussing "The American Business Man," Mr. Rockefeller remarks that "good old-fashioned common sense has always been a mighty rare commodity."

He writes entertainingly and lucidly of the relations between capital and labor and the duties of men of wealth, whose brains as well as their money, Mr. Rockefeller says, are needed by our institutions devoted to helping men to help themselves.

"Some of these men, however," Mr. Rockefeller says, "are so absorbed in their business affairs that * * * if they do interest themselves in a work outside their office and undertake to raise money, they begin an analogy as if they are ashamed of themselves. 'I am no beggar.' I have heard many of them say, to which I would only reply, 'I am sorry you feel that way about it.'"

"I have been this sort of a beggar all my life, and the experiences I have had were so interesting and important to me that I will venture to speak of them in a future chapter."

The article in World's Work is splendidly illustrated with fac-similes of Mr. Rockefeller's handwriting and many old as well as new photographs of the Oil King and his work.

ONE WEAK SPOT

Most Ocala People Have a Weak Part and Too Often It's the Back

Everyone has a weak spot, and often it's a bad back. Twinges follow every sudden twist. Dull aching keeps up day and night. Tells you the kidneys need help—For backache is really kidney-ache. A kidney cure is what you need. Doan's Kidney Pills cure sick kidneys.

Cure backache and all urinary ills. Mrs. W. R. Pell, of Third St., Sanford, Fla., says: "I am pleased to recommend Doan's Kidney Pills taking in view what they have done for me. I have suffered from backache a great deal and at times was so lame that I could scarcely turn in bed. Some mornings my condition was such that I found it difficult to dress myself. Whenever I stooped, sharp pains would dart through my body, especially in the region of my kidneys. I also had some trouble from the too frequent action of the kidney secretions. After I had used several remedies with only slight benefit, I heard of Doan's Kidney Pills and procured a box. I used them and they brought me the desired relief. I am now able to rest well at night, am free from pain and lameness and feel stronger and better in every way."

Plenty more proof like this from Ocala people. Call at Tydings & Co.'s drug store and ask what their customers report.
