AT THE CHURCHES

Episcopal

Rev. H. W. Little, rector of Grace Episcopal church, preached a very able and impressive sermon Sunday morning from the words: "And he came to himself," Luke 15:17. It was the story of the prodigal son. In substance he said it was the most familiar passage in Scripture and one of the most beautiful and grand when taken with all its environments and soul-saving significance. This passage has been studied as no other in the Bible. The most renowned of artists have depicted the scene on canvas, poets have sung their highest lay in its praise and honor and divines never tired in telling the touching story. He spoke of how people came to themselves in their experiences with the world and in passing through life. Many come to themselves early in life and never have any experiences such as the chapter told of in the life of the prodigal son. They intuitively, instinctively come to Christ in their childhood or early youth and never know any of the temptations, trials and baleful experiences through which the prodigal children are obliged to pass. These, having drunk to the dregs the curse of evil living and wrongdoing and experienced all bitterness, woe and want of such an existence, finally come to themselves. They see the enormity of their transgressions, the heinousness of their offending, not only against themselves, their parents, family, kindred and friends, but against their Maker, and see as they never saw before the enormity of their sins. He said the grandest passage in the Bible was where the prodigal son awoke to a consciousness of his guilt and said, "I will arise and go to my father's house." He had thoroughly reformed. He didn't debate the question and set up aught in extenuation
