THE COOKING OF FOOD.

Has Science Stopped Outside the Door of the Domestic Kitchen?

Professor Edward Atkinson has given long, careful and scientific study to the art of cooking as now practiced, and his conclusions on the subject are as follows:

I learned that the way to spoil meat was to boil it; the way to cook an egg was not to boil it; the way to render the best meat indigestible and to convert the finest flavor into bad smells was to subject it to the barbarous processes commonly practiced at excessive heat on the iron stove and range. I learned that slow cooking at a moderate temperature is the only rule in 95 cases out of 100. It is the only rule in respect to meat, fish and bread.

An example of improper and proper cooking is given in the egg: If an egg is boiled—that is to say, if it is subjected to a heat of 212 degrees F. or over for 10 minutes—the yolk will become mealy, but the albumen, or white of the egg, becomes hard, horny and indigestible. If the egg is subjected to the high boiling heat for only three minutes, the white remains soft, but the heat will not penetrate the yolk to any considerable extent. In that condition the so called soft boiled egg is palatable, nutritious and wholesome, but the yolk is substantially uncooked. Subject the egg to a moderate degree of heat, anywhere from 180 degrees to 190 degrees F., for 10 minutes, or even at a less temperature for a longer time, and then the whole substance of the egg is cooked to a soft and jellylike condition which is digestible and nutritious.

Again, given a tough piece of meat, to boil it is to spoil it. It may be "boiled to rags," according to the common expression, the juices may be extracted, and the meat may appear to be tender, but it is in fact stringy. Each fiber is horny and separately so tough that it is unfit to eat. Subject the same tough muscle to a heat of about 190 degrees for a long period of time, either in water or in a closed vessel in its own juices, subjected to heat outside, then while the flavors and juices are all retained the muscle is disintegrated, and the whole becomes as tender as the tenderest part of the animal. The beef's heart, which is the toughest muscle, when dealt with in this way, may be made as tender as the tenderloin. A tough old fowl may be converted into a tender roasted chicken somewhat higher in flavor than a true chicken.

If these exceptions to the common practice are sustained, it follows of necessity that a true science of cooking can not be established without very great and revolutionary changes. Moreover, it becomes manifest that if the apparatus in use is bad the art of cooking must remain crude, empirical and commonly bad.

Professor Atkinson's theory and practice of applying heat to food are to "box it up in a nonheat conducting chamber" to which he can "convey heat by measure and maintain it at any suitable and even temperature," the heat being supplied by an oil lamp or gas burner.

The Cup of Tea Abroad.

There is nothing more refreshing at all times than a good cup of tea, but it is seldom found at home or abroad. There is a tradition that only at Carlsbad can tea in its perfection be drunk. This lets in light on the mystery of the problem—the solution is the character of the water with which the tea is made. The best means of imitating the soft water of Carlsbad is to add a pinch of soda to the water before it is boiled for brewing tea. A pretty silver bonbon box filled with bicarbonate of soda should be the vassal of the hissing urn and have its place with equal rank by the side of the caddy.

The Russians, so famous for their tea, put the tea into boiling water, and not the boiling water upon the tea, as, they maintain, the temperature of the water is lowered by pouring it into the teapot. It is conceded that tea should come into contact with boiling water (212 degrees F.) and should remain at that temperature as nearly as possible for several minutes. Take an ordinary brown earthenware teapot. Put into it the required quantity of water, either cold or hot, and place it over the fire or gas stove. When the water boils and blows out of the hole in the lid, which will be in a few minutes, put in the tea, place the lid upon the teapot and put it on the table to draw for a few minutes and then pour it into the silver teapot, leaving the tea leaves in the earthenware pot.

And in Spain, according to a writer in Harper's Bazar, a branch from the luxuriant lemon verbena tree is served with the tea. A leaf is pinched off and thrown into the empty cup; then the hot tea is poured upon it, and immediately the lemon verbena leaf is withdrawn, giving a delicate fragrant bouquet to the tea and imparting, the Spaniards say, a valuable stomachic quality to the afternoon cup of tea.

Wild Rose Design For Embroidery.

The material for the accompanying design is fine linen. To fringe it first mark the requisite size, then a swerved circle the depth of the fringe beyond. Stitch round the inner line with the machine and cut neatly in the outer. Fringe out on all four sides, so to speak, or at each point which allows of pulling a straight thread. When you have reached the stitching, there will remain four triangular pieces of unfringed cloth. With your needle pull all these threads round till a circle is formed; then rip out the stitching, buttonhole the edge and trim the fringe well.

The Decorator and Furnisher, the source of the design, directs to use for the flowers filo silk in natural shades of pink; for leaves and stems, olive green, and for the center of each use yellow. Work the entire design in solid Kensington stitch, shading as indicated by the drawing, but for the centers use French knots of yellow. As the rose is the wild one and simple in form, it is possible to get very realistic effects and to follow closely a painted model.
