The Perversity Of Young Love

(Original.)

Horace Bradbury and Julia Insee were of a very simple type of young lovers. One would naturally suppose that they would twine together like two vine shoots. Their hearts did, but they did not. This was not because there were obstructions in the way of their union, for there were not. It was a simple natural perversity.

In the first place, Horace took a long time to discover that he wanted Julia—so long indeed that every one else, including the object of his affection, knew it long before he did himself.

Horace at last found out the secret of his heart, and when he did he burned to tell it at once to the girl he loved. He chose the first opportunity that presented itself, and that was not a propitious one. They were together on a nutting party with a large number of young people of their own age. Horace asked Julia to saunter away from the others with him. Julia knew at a glance his object in going and with a natural feminine perversity, together with a desire to punish him for taking so much time before making his declaration, threw straws in his way.

"What do you want to go away from all the fun for?" she asked.

"I want to show you something."

"What?"

"A bridge below over the creek. It's a nice place to sit and talk."

"What do you want to talk about?"

"I've something important to tell you."

"Suppose I don't want to hear it?"

Horace was thrown flat aback. It hadn't occurred to him that she would not wish to hear what he had to say.

"Well, then," he said, "I suppose there's no use in telling you, and, walking away, he joined some one else.

The two did not come together again till shortly before the time of departure. Then Julia was very gracious. Horace's brow was cloudy. Julia remarked that there would be time for a walk before going home. Horace said there would be only time for a very short walk, and he didn't care for a short walk.

"I thought you had something to tell me," said Julia.

"I had," said Horace.

"What has become of it?" asked Julia.

"You didn't want to hear it, and I'm keeping it for some one else."

Julia looked sober. She said nothing for awhile, but when she did it formed a very important link in these very ordinary proceedings.

"Jim Hawkins wanted me to walk to the bridge with him awhile ago," she said.

Jim Hawkins was Horace's only rival—that is, he would have been had Horace had a rival. At any rate, his name at this critical juncture struck as much terror into Horace as the name of the Black Douglas in days of old into little children. But perversity is not solely a feminine trait.

"Why didn't you go?" he remarked.

"It wouldn't have been very nice of me to go with him when I had refused to go with you."

"Maybe he had something to tell you."

"If he had I didn't want to hear it." Circumstance as well as perversity has something to do with such cases, and in this case circumstance interfered just as the matter was in a fair way to be straightened out. Mary Dale, the only girl Julia was afraid of so far as Horace was concerned, came up and reminded Horace that he had promised to show her the waterfall up the creek a bit. Horace said that he would not only keep his promise, but be very glad to do so.

When Horace and Mary returned the picnic was breaking up and the young people were putting the empty lunch baskets into the wagons. Horace looked about for Julia and failed to see her. He hunted for her and found her sitting behind a big tree crying. Woman's tears are to a man what oil is to hardened putty. Horace softened.

"What's the matter?" he asked, in a loverlike tone.

"I'm disappointed," she sobbed, dabbling her handkerchief into her eyes.

"What about?"

"I've always wanted to see that bridge and now we're going home and I haven't."

This was a surprise to Horace. He stood thinking.

"Would you like to go to the bridge now?" he asked presently.

"How'll we get home?"

"We'll have to walk, I expect."

"I don't know that I can walk so far."

"I think you can. It's only seven miles."

Some one cried "All aboard!"

"Can you do it?"

Julia made no reply. The tree was between her and the wagons and she was waiting for them to be gone.

The wagons once on their way, Horace and Julia waited till the shouting of the boys and girls died away in the distance, then Julia arose and the two walked down the creek toward the bridge.

The story had already been told. What use to trudge a mile to tell it again in words? And were any words spoken? If they were they were doubtless but three, and could have been said at any time.

The pair sat by the bridge five minutes, then got up and proceeded to pay for the privilege of having done so by a three hours' tramp to town. Was it paying for the privilege or was it an additional happiness? One must not be very young or have a good memory to answer the question.
