The Saloon Makes Business in Bristol, Tennessee

The wisdom of local option was clearly demonstrated at Bristol, Va., last Friday, when the saloons came back into power.

"Business" of "the community affected thereby" received a general uplift and the "revenue" argument was greatly strengthened.

One man—a citizen of dry Blountville—who had not tasted liquor for several years, imbibed so freely that he fell from his wagon and was killed.

This helped the business of the coffin factory and of the undertaker, and gave employment to grave diggers.

The wife and "three small children" of the dead man will also be helped in a business way, for they will have to earn their own support.

There were two attempts at murder. It is not a dead sure thing, but the chances are good that indictments will be found against those would-be murderers; that the clerk's fees will be increased, that attorneys will reap much needed fees, the state or county pay the costs, and a political henchman be paid several times more than the defendant's trial attorney to get a pardon.

If saloons do not "help business," what do they help?

If saloons do not "increase revenue," what do they increase?

Several cases of wife-beating were also reported as evidence of the general uplift to "business" and "revenue" given by the Grand Opening.

In this way the doctors and druggists picked up several bills that they may credit to the beneficent influences of local option.

Judge Rice of the city court fixed the fine for drunkenness at $25.

Men from the dry territory surrounding Bristol showed their desire to help "business" and increase "revenue" by filling the jails with their drunken carcasses. Not being able to get to the jail themselves, many new policemen had to be employed to help them along, and to prevent the accumulation of so much "revenue" that "business" would be stagnated and a panic brought on.

While our correspondent reports a "carnival of drunkenness," and men standing at the bar "three and four deep," it is not Bristol alone that will reap a rich harvest from Bristol's local option.

The miners and mountaineers, after loading themselves to the guard on the inside, are returning to their homes laden with packages that will help the business of the undertakers and grave diggers, sheriffs and court clerks in other counties; give the state and county more costs to pay, more orphans and paupers to care for.

Heretofore we have inclined to the view that it is grievous wrong by the people who have gotten rid of the saloons themselves to force saloons upon one city in a large dry territory and make that one city the gathering place for all the criminal class for a hundred miles around, and convert it into a hotbed of lawlessness and the center of gravity for murder and riot.

But since we have read the reports of how "political rest," "prosperity," "revenue" and "business" have come to Bristol we are wondering if we could have been mistaken in our opposition to local option.—Nashville Tennessean.

Judge Byron Preston, of Iowa, has decided that the depositing of A. M. Henderson, mayor of Marengo, was constitutional. One of the offenses for which mayors can be removed under the new law is intoxication. Henderson insisted that he had never been drunk "on duty," but Judge Preston said a mayor is always on duty.

The local option law of Idaho has gone into effect. The first two counties to vote under the law were Idaho and Canyon. Both went dry.

A truthful history of the liquor traffic is always tragedy. It makes no difference in what land the history is written. It is the same in whatever part of our own land the record is made. If he who writes it is possessed of exact knowledge, of the nature and effect of alcoholic drinks, his arraignment of the liquor traffic will be of damnable crimes committed; his warning to all the people will be: "Beware of the serpent of the still. Let him not get his coils about you. There is no falsehood too brazen for him to tell. When once his fangs have stuck into the life, nothing short of super-human strength can break his hold, or set the victims free." Consequently we need not spend much time nor space on the characterization of the traffic in whiskey—the traffic in homes, in love, in peace, in childhood and in souls. The words uttered by one of seventeen convict saloon-keepers in a California penitentiary, "There are no words in the English language to paint the liquor business as black as it ought to be painted," are true. That's what men say everywhere who have given it even a superficial investigation.

Confessed His Mistake

The proprietor of the Terminal hotel, located at Birmingham, Ala., has changed his mind in regard to the necessity of the saloon from the business standpoint. Before Birmingham went dry under the local option law, this man along with most other hotel proprietors opposed the abolition of the saloon, urging that to eliminate such an institution would be to paralyze business.

The following statement, however, from Mr. Robertson shows how completely he has changed his mind on this question:

"I was opposed to prohibition when the election was held. I didn't believe the law would be enforced. We have a large city with a great many foreigners. Besides the panic, we had a coal strike that lasted several months. Statistics show that under prohibition 1908, there have been more goods bought and paid for, collections better, arrests and police court cases diminished nearly half. I had an idea that it would hurt the city in a general way, but it is not so. I believe if we were to hold an election here now prohibition would get a big majority."

In the county option election held in South Carolina on August 17th, sixteen counties voted dry and six counties voted for the dispensary. This makes 22 of the 42 counties in the state dry.
