Citrus grove inches closer to becoming neighborhood

ISAAC BABCOCK
The Voice

The home of a 26.12-acre Oviedo citrus grove moved a step closer to becoming a housing development after the City Council voted 5-0 to change its land use Monday.

The change was part of a process that could eventually see a planned development by Standard Pacific Homes that would build up to three homes per acre of the parcel of groves crossing Lee Avenue. That property density is less than would have been allowed in Seminole County before the city annexed the land.

Many of the city's former citrus groves have become housing developments, including near the proposed site.

"What we're asking for is consistent with the adjacent developments," attorney Travis Rentz, representing the builder, said.

Though the development has legislative momentum, it still has several votes left before it becomes a reality.

"It's a long road yet," Mayor Dominic Persampiere said.

Florida gets tapped

TIM FREED
The Voice

For thirsty patrons in the Roaring Twenties, a glass of wine wasn't hard to find, despite the laws that made it illegal to sell. From the back rooms of barber shops and spaghetti houses to open saloons behind peepholes, underground establishments kept the giggle water flowing.

Even the vineyards found a way, selling dried grapes in containers marked with warnings to avoid storage in jugs for more than 21 days due to risk of fermentation. Was this a law-abiding measure or a reminder of the fruit's wine-making potential?

But though glasses of wine transcended their legal taboo just after President Franklin Roosevelt took office, a vestige of prohibition has remained in Florida for nearly 80 years.

Within a few weeks, wine may again flow from taps in Florida.

Winning the eating disorder mind game

MEGAN STOKES
The Voice

Mary Hageman has lost friends to eating disorders.

It wasn't the disorder itself that killed them, but the mental and emotional anguish that drove them to take their own lives.

"I have seen it several times," said Hageman, who runs a support group for women with food addiction and eating disorders. "It's tragic and angering because the truth of the situation is that this is a disease people can't control, and often times people are not given the opportunity to get the help they need."

Hageman said one of the biggest obstacles to people getting the help they need is the limited resources available in the community. She said White Picket Fence in Winter Park is one of few that treats the mental health and emotional aspects of obesity.

"I think there's a large stigma around eating disorders - anorexia, bulimia and bingeing," Hageman said. "People think it should be controlled by will. And that goes for people who suffer from it and people who don't."

White Picket Fence founder and clinical director Sandee Nebel said many doctors still treat obesity as something that is controlled through willpower, but she said there are always mental health and emotional issues that need to be addressed as well.

"People assume it's about moving more and eating less," Nebel said. "There are people who can do that and they're good to go, but then there are others who have some emotional and mental health issues to work through."

"I try to compare it to an iceberg: What we see is above the surface, but there's so much more."

Even those who struggle with being overweight or obese feel as if they should be able to control their behavior and Dr. Indira Abraham-Pratt, a psychologist with Florida Hospital's Healthy 100 Kids program, which works with obese children and their families, said that feeling can make getting help even more difficult.

"We have a lot of families feeling intimidated when they come to us," she said. "They feel like they should already know how to do this. It's not as easy as the eat-less, move-more approach. We try to remove that stigma, to help them know they're not at fault."

Abraham-Pratt agreed that there aren't many programs that attempt to treat the whole person when it comes to obesity.

"I have phone calls coming in all the time asking about other resources in the community. Families come from an hour to an hour and a half away because they don't have resources in their community," she said. "It's quite scarce."

"A lot of times, families don't have the funds or insurance doesn't cover it," she added.

WINE | Kegging law could save money and the environment

A Prohibition Era law that limits the size of wine containers sold in Florida could be modified with a bill in the coming weeks with a signature from Gov. Rick Scott.

The current law bans the sale of wine in containers greater than 1 gallon. But by July 1, wine could be available in 5.16 gallon steel kegs and sold on tap in local restaurants and bars.

"I think it's way overdue," said Rick Brown, a Winter Springs Commissioner and owner of multiple Tijuana Flats restaurant locations. "Florida has been lagging behind in its ability to do away with bottles altogether and actually serve wine out of a tap. I think it's really going to catch the wine service industry on fire in Florida to have the ability to serve a fresh glass of wine every time."

Florida is one of only two states in the nation — the other being Utah — that doesn't allow wineries to distribute wine in kegs.

Lobbying for the bill earlier this year was Free Flow Wines, a California-based wine kegging company that pioneered premium wine on tap as a concept. With Florida prohibited from selling wine in kegs, Free Flow Wines saw an opportunity for future business in the Sunshine State.

"The state of Florida, being the number two wine market in the United States of America, is a very important market for all of our winery clients," said Free Flow Wines founder and chairman Dan Donahoe. "All of these wineries are very interested in selling their wines on tap in Florida, from very large resorts like Disney to fine dining establishments like Luma in Winter Park."

Donahoe stressed not only the economic possibilities that come with wine in kegs, but also the environmental role they play.

"The bill will allow a 5.1 gallon reusable keg into the state of Florida," Donahoe said. "That will eliminate, as soon as that first keg is tapped, 26 bottles from the trash cans at bars, restaurants and resorts in Florida."

"Multiply that across the number of kegs that each bar and restaurant will use, and it equates to an enormous green factor and savings on trash."

The recent bill also caught the attention of Eola Wine Company, a wine establishment in Winter Park with a selection of more than 70 wines by the glass.

"I think it would be something unique to offer our customers," said owner Scott Schrope.

"There's a few of the white wines that would be great to have on keg. That would be fantastic."

Eola Wine Company General Manager Matt Coltrin gave his outlook on the future regarding kegs of wine in Florida.

"Bottling costs for wine are hugely expensive, so I think, in a matter of time, you'll start to see some of the more innovative wineries trying it out," Coltrin said. "I don't see it happening right away; it will take time to progress."

"It'll be interesting to see how it unfolds."

Healthy 100 Kids does not turn anyone away due to finances.

But Nebel said there is some progress being made in the treatment of obesity. This year, for the first time, Nebel said binge eating will be identified as a disorder in the Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders.

"Which means there's an opportunity for insurance to pay for treatment," Nebel said.

To help fill the gap for now, Nebel started the nonprofit White Picket Fence Foundation about a year ago. They see about 20 patients a week for little to no cost out of leased space on the Calvary Church property in Winter Park, offering one-on-one and family counseling, support groups and meditation.

But Nebel said she knows the need is greater.

"It's not very popular to say, 'I'm overweight, let me go to counseling and work through this for a year or two,'" she said. "People want immediate results, which is hard for some people to maintain. We hope to be able to help more people."

Fighting 'dirty words'

KRISTY VICKERY
The Voice

Birthday presents usually come wrapped in carefully folded paper and shining bows, with warm smiles and celebration, but for Bonnie Donihi her 47th birthday was not quite as celebratory as she imagined.

She was diagnosed with stage-three ovarian cancer, just three days before her birthday.

"It certainly was a shock; I had no idea," she said. "I didn't even know what ovarian cancer was."

She never imagined the cancer would recur three times, and she'd still be educating others about the disease 18 years later.

"I started realizing that people weren't talking about ovarian cancer and I needed to get the discussion going," she said.

Donihi then decided to start educating women about what she calls the "dirty words" that no one was willing to talk about, which led her to join a group of women from across the nation to form a non-profit organization called the Ovarian Cancer Alliance of Florida (OCAF). She is now spreading the word to many women suffering their own personal battles with ovarian cancer; a disease that according to the CDC Gynecologic Cancer Statistics, affected 20,460 women in the U.S. in 2009, 14,436 of which were fatal.

"We live under this false sense of security that getting our annual pap smears [is] taking care of all genealogical cancers, when in fact, we don't have a test for uterine, vaginal, or ovarian cancer," Donihi said.

The OCAF is hosting their fifth annual 5K Mother's Day Teal Ribbon Run & Walk at Oviedo Mall on May 12 to bring awareness and advocacy to the disease so many know so little about.

"This message of education is really important," OCAF event coordinator Denise Lee said. "And she (Donihi) is very decided to the organization."

She said they are expecting a turnout of 700 to 1,000 people for the family event.

"It's a great community event," Donihi said. "It's just another avenue to raise awareness for our organization."

Bonnie Donihi has spent nearly two decades breaking stigmas while teaching women how to detect ovarian cancer before it's too late, working with the Ovarian Cancer Alliance of Florida.

Bonnie's husband Tim will also be participating in the event and said he couldn't be more proud of his wife of 44 years.

"She's accomplished a lot," he said. "The main reason she does it is because she doesn't want our daughters to end up in the same ovarian cancer prison she was in."

Having seen her follow him for 26 years in the Navy, Tim said it's his turn to give back.

"All those years we went places, she had to follow along, she was a great Navy wife," he said. "So I'm trying to be a great husband now — payback."

Bonnie has been cancer free for five years now, and she and her husband look forward to each new day they have together, trying to cross as many things off their bucket lists as possible.

Bonnie said every year they try to do something new. This year they are planning a trip to Mexico to swim with the whale sharks.

"I try to make every day count, and embrace life to the fullest," she said. "I try to do something every day that I'll be proud of, because I truly know how short life can be."

Challenger baseball reaches out to children and young adults with special needs

BRITTNI JOHNSON
The Voice

They can tell a million incredible stories about what happens on the Challenger baseball fields. Kids using walkers let go just long enough to hit a pitched baseball, others whose parents never thought they'd be social or focused enough to follow the game, hit balls and run bases like any other player. On the Challenger teams, anything seems possible.

Oviedo Little League's Challenger team players have a range of mental and physical disabilities, but they all have a passion for the game.

Before Steve and Barbara Trimble's son Mark started playing baseball, doctors told them they better learn some sign language to communicate with him. Mark is autistic, and hadn't said a word even though he was elementary school aged.

"I never thought that he would ever have a word come out of his mouth," Barbara said. And then he got involved in Challenger baseball in 2002, and it made a world of difference in him. "When he comes out here he just opens up," Steve said.

Mark talks now, and greets and hugs everyone. He hits balls to the outfield fence. He gives high-fives to his teammates, and gets up way too early on game days out of excitement. He loves playing baseball, and his attitude reflects all the players on the Challenger teams, said Jill Woodard, director of the program.

"They thank God every day

Challenger player Rafael Vandestreek takes the field with help from volunteer Cory Faiello and organizer Jill Woodard.

they can be here," she said. "They've lived their whole life watching their siblings play; now it's their turn."

It's an amazing thing for their parents to watch. When Kathleen Williams was pregnant with her son, she had the same dreams many moms have. She imagined her son playing sports – maybe even going pro one day – and going to dances and hanging out with friends. But then her son was diagnosed with autism, and even following baseball's rules seemed out of his reach.

"You start with the can'ts and every one of your dreams dies for your child," Williams said. "You cry."

But then they found Challenger sports. CJ Williams first played football, and when he put on that jersey there was no way to stop the tears of joy, Williams said. Now CJ gets to live his own dreams. What these players overcome on the field, their parents say, is extraordinary.

"If I sat down and thought about it, I would cry every time," said Wendy Saliga, whose son plays with CJ and Mark.

Instead they smile. The moms and dads light up when they see their sons play and laugh just like any other teenager. It's an environment and experience that can't be duplicated, Saliga said.

The players also have volunteer student buddies, many of which play on their school's baseball team, to guide them during games and practices. The younger and minor league players need more help because they don't grasp the game yet, or physically can't do some things like pick up a ball or run the bases alone.

The major league teams just need someone to encourage them to throw the ball in the right direction or to be told to keep running toward home. And there's the same camaraderie you'd see on any team.

"They come out here and they love these kids," Woodard said about her high school buddies. "They learn what's important in life."

"You help them do what they love to do, and what we love too," said Stephen Jackson, a Hagerty High School senior. "Out here, we're all the same, disability doesn't matter; we're all here to play baseball."

At the game, Mark's dad Steve perks up when he's at bat. He takes his stance, the ball is tossed toward him and he hits it right down the middle. Mark races around the bases, crossing home plate without a second thought.

"No one has to tell Mark to keep running," Steve says with a grin.

Orlando named top market in U.S. for house-flipping profit

RealtyTrac recently named Orlando as the No. 1 market in the U.S. for flipping homes. Spring is in full bloom and it would appear love is in the air for investors hoping to make a killing in the Orlando real estate market. Daren Blomquist, RealtyTrac vice president, stated May 1 that the average price investors were paying for homes in Orlando was $103,701, and the resale price when sold within six months or less averaged $168,677, a profit of just under $65,000. The website went on to note that nearly 2,000 homes had been "flipped" in the Orlando area in 2012.

Christina Rordam
Keepin' it Real Estate

Investors typically purchase a home that needs some work with cash, remodel it, and then resell it for profit. Many large investment groups hire their own teams of contractors and buy supplies in bulk. Once the home is given curb appeal and some interior flair, it is resold. With the available inventory down from 8,666 last March to the current supply of 6,937, there are fewer homes to choose from. Buyers however, are not discouraged by this fact. National Association of Realtors chief economist Lawrence Yun specifically pointed out in the March Pending Home Sales Index that the growth of the housing sector is not limited by demand, but supply. Pending contracts are up nationwide 1.5 percent from February and predicted to increase 7 percent over 2012, and the investors are taking note. Homes are not only selling for more now, they're selling faster too. The average number of days a home is on the market in Orlando is down from 97 to 80 year-over-year.

The news is fabulous for both buyers and sellers. Many owners previously under water may no longer be upside down, and sellers that are not distressed can count on selling their homes faster and for more money. Multiple offers on homes are commonplace in today's market so sellers don't have to settle. While interest rates climbed slightly this week they remain in the 3 percent range, so even if a buyer pays a few thousand more, their payments are still affordable. Anyone looking for a reason to invest in the Orlando real estate market has plenty to choose from, and local homeowners are reaping the rewards.

VOICES

THIS WEEK in political history

May 16, 1717 —

French writer Francois-Marie Arouet, better known as Voltaire, is imprisoned in the Bastille. His satirical attack on politics and religion had infuriated the government, and Voltaire was arrested. Several times in his life, Voltaire was forced to flee one step ahead of arrest.

A Mother's Day reunion

STETSON'S CORNER

By Karen McEnany-Phillips

The early sunrise spread pink hues over the lake as a pair of eagles watched her from above their nest on the forked cypress branch. She sipped her coffee, closed her eyes and breathed in the morning. The late-blooming gardenia bush added a sweet scent to air not yet weighed down by humidity.

Losing mom

As beautiful as this second Sunday in May was, it didn't feel like Mother's Day. Six months ago what was supposed to be a hopeful New Year crashed before it began when she lost her own mother to a stroke. And just when she had started to regain her bearings from the postmortem whirlwind, her son announced he was joining the Army ROTC and was now immersed in basic training three states away.

She stepped off the porch and a barred owl flew off its perch from the live oak, swept across her path, and silently relocated to a pine on the edge of the barbed wire fence line.

Silence of an empty nest

She welcomed the sounds of nature. The woodpeckers' intermittent knocks, the chickens' distant crowing, the trill of redbirds and the incoming trumpeting of sand hill cranes. Even the rumbling of a pickup and trailer hurtling down the dirt road was better than the silence.

Her house had experienced an almost Jekyll and Hyde transformation. Hectic days of mourning activities, frantic packing of a soon-to-be Army grunt, and now the abandoned silence of her empty nest. She spotted a group of deer in the side pasture with three fawns. Nurturing in the wild was so different.

Hardest job and important lessons

"We're spoiled," she thought. "Human moms expect to have their kids around for nearly a quarter century." Unlike the deer and wild turkey mothers who have a handful of months to teach and prepare their young for survival. Sand hill cranes' moms must have the patience of Job to teach their chicks to walk and fly in a few months. Moms of all species have the hardest jobs in the world. Blending practical lessons of survival and discipline with social guidelines and nurturing affection is not easy.

When she left the hospital with her newborn daughter 30 years ago she hoped patience and skill would come quickly. Like all moms, she learned that would not be the case. But through it all she was lucky to find reserves and resolve to teach her kids love – albeit sometimes tough love – and seek the humor and lessons for them and for her own soul. She did her best every day through head lice, stomach flu, hormones, broken limbs and fragile egos. No matter how old she and they lived they would always be her babies.

Mother and child at odds

And then a week ago there was the argument with her daughter. Ten minutes of female frustration seemed to erupt out of nowhere and spun out of control. Ten minutes she wished she could erase. Six hundred harsh seconds exchanged with her firstborn, and worse, played out in front of her 4-year-old granddaughter. Something stupid, unimportant in the grand scheme, but still neither had apologized.

She turned back to the house intending to wave the white flag and surrender the battle.

And then came another sound. A familiar vehicle rolled down the shell driveway toward her. It stopped yards away and her daughter jumped out and opened the back door. A miniature Alice in Wonderland holding a big pink card jumped out. "Nana! Nana!" Four-year old Alice ran full steam ahead toward her grandmother. Bracing for impact the huge hug unlocked a floodgate of tears. She kissed the top of Alice's blond head and opened her wet eyes. Her tears flowed harder as she opened her arms to embrace her daughter and then a tall young man with a crew cut, dressed in camouflage.

And then a week ago there was the argument with her daughter. Ten minutes of female frustration seemed to erupt out of nowhere and spun out of control. Ten minutes she wished she could erase.

Happy Mother's Day to all our Geneva and surrounding area mothers!

Connections are your best assets

Colleges are getting ready to graduate the class of 2013, and many of the students will face a tougher-than-expected job market. The good news is the job market is the best it has been in the past five years; the bad news is that it is still tough, especially for new graduates.

If you are getting ready to graduate and you do not yet have a job planned, there are several things you can do right away.

The first is to connect with the on-campus career department to see what job fairs, on-campus recruiting and job opportunities they know about. Alumni are also welcome at many of these events. The second is to make sure you have a good resume, and the third is to network like crazy.

The on-campus career department is under-utilized from my conversations with new graduates. I think I walked into the one on my college campus once, attended a job fair, and still walked away with no sense of closure. The people who work there have the sole purpose of helping graduates get jobs, and many employers, at least the larger ones, have recruiters who are focused on college grads. They may have seminars and other events you can connect to as well.

A good resume is crucial for success. You can list your college activities, volunteering, internships, and jobs you have held. Make sure to highlight transitional skills that can be used in the prospective job. Christian HELP is currently offering a job skills series that includes resume preparation. Classes are free and could be very beneficial for new graduates.

Networking is still the No. 1 way to get a job. It is OK to let your parents help you in this. My dad helped to secure my first interview, and I have been networking ever since. Reach out to student groups, association groups, chambers and meet-ups to meet people who can help you with your search.

Lastly, never underestimate the power of a good internship. The experience and connections you will gain can be invaluable in your search.

Young Voices

Here's what kids at Central Winds Park in Winter Springs had to say about what they like about team sports, baseball and softball.

I'm on the Green Fireflies softball team. I like when we hit the ball. We are playing against two purple teams. Our coach shows us how to throw and hit. We practice a lot. Today I play in the outfield.
—Camryn S.
5 years old

I'm on the Pride and Panthers travel softball teams. I like fielding and play first base. Our team has won many trophies. My coach taught me how to catch and throw properly. I've played since I was 3.
—Abby G.
8 years old

When the baseball comes to you, it might be hard to catch, so my coach says keep your eye on the ball. I've made friends on my team. It's fun. I've played since I was little.
—Davis P.
7 years old

I like playing center field and also being the catcher. My baseball coach says to keep your elbows up and your eye on the ball. I use a metal bat and I like batting the ball. We practice a lot.
—Keenan M.
7 years old

I used to play second base, and today my brother plays baseball. Now I play the clarinet in the Lake Mary High School marching band. It's fun to be on a team, and we will stay friends all our lives.
