Port visit—The USS De Wert (FFG 45), homeported in Mayport, Fla., stops briefly at Guantanamo Bay on Saturday, Feb. 3, for a port visit to give the crew a little liberty, get fuel, and to replenish supplies. The frigate departed homeport shortly after Christmas to participate in a counter-narcotics deployment in support of U.S. Naval Forces Southern Command.

CNO: QDR ‘vectors’ Navy to new skills

By Chief of Naval Operations Public Affairs

WASHINGTON (NNS) — The Defense Department's recently released Quadrennial Defense Review will “vector” the Navy toward the development of new skills and critical missions, Chief of Naval Operations Adm. Mike Mullen said during an interview Feb. 3.

Segments of the interview are now airing in several formats, including Daily News Update and Navy/Marine Corps Radio News, available on the Navy's web site.

“The QDR endorses some very significant vectors that we need to pay attention to,” Mullen said during an interview with Journalist 2nd Class (SW/AW) Chad Bricks of the Naval Media Center. “We're bringing on a new riverine force, and that will require new skills. We've stood up a new Expeditionary Combat Command, and that will require a new organization and new training. We'll expand our foreign area officer program, increase the kinds of cultural skills ... to engage in the littoral right up to the shore line and, indeed, in the rivers of countries around the world who ask for our help.”

Mullen said it is important to understand the QDR against the backdrop of the demands of the long war on terror and the Navy's ongoing transformation efforts.

“When the previous QDR was published it was just after 9-11, and the world has changed dramatically since then,” he noted. “We have worked hard to transform ourselves to make sure we bring the capabilities in a very robust way to a future that will continue to be very, very demanding.

He said the war will last “a significant amount of time. I call it generational.”

Key to success in that struggle, according to Mullen, will be acting and thinking more like the Navy SEALs and other special warfare troops, who focus on agility and lethality. He calls it being “SOF-like,” referring to the acronym for Special Operations Forces.

“I think all of us need to be thinking more SOF-like. We need to be more agile. We need to be light on our feet. We need to be more precise, more lethal, and it is important for the joint force that we provide that capability. We can do that at sea.”

The Navy/Marine Corps have always been expeditionary but Mullen said the review calls on all the services to sharpen that capability and to build close working relationships with outside agencies.

“The QDR tells us we need to be more interdependent, not just the Navy and Marine Corps but the entire Joint Force,” he said. “We need to pay particular attention to what's going on in the other agencies in our government, because this is a team that must work together to solve these problems both in our own country and internationally. That interdependence, not just across the other services, but also throughout our government is really key.”

The CNO singled out the U.S. Coast Guard as one agency the Navy has been working very closely with to strengthen the nation's maritime defenses, calling that work “critical” to homeland security and maritime domain awareness for our own coast, as well as coasts around world.”

The QDR also calls for the Navy to have a “greater presence in the Pacific Ocean, con-

Bravo Zulu from USCGC Diligence

By CDR A. R. Gentilella, Commanding Officer

I would like to extend my sincere appreciation and gratitude to NAVSTA GTMO personnel, particularly BM2 Cevallos and AVDET's SKC Lim for exceptional pierside and logistical services rendered to USCGC Diligence (WMEC 616) during a series of mid-patrol breaks and brief stops for fuel in the month of January. Their support was the best I have ever witnessed.

During each of the three different times Diligence pulled into GTMO, unforeseen operational changes demanded short-notice arrival adjustments. Without question, BM2 Cevallos immediately reacted, adjusting fueling arrangements, waste disposal, line-handlers, and a myriad of other services. Simply put, BM2 Cevallos and his team flawlessly met each and every ship demand, and did so with optimal flexibility and professionalism. His aggressive team of line-handlers were consistently early, poised, and always met the ship with a smile and “can-do” attitude.

SKC Lim and his team at AVDET GTMO also went above and beyond on each occasion. A member of AVDET always met the ship ready to assist and with essential supplies needed to keep Diligence fully mission capable.

Bravo Zulu for your untiring work ethic and team spirit!

W.T. Sampson Elementary sponsors book fair

By JO2(AW) Honey Nixon, NAVSTA Public Affairs Office

Students file in neatly at the door of W.T. Sampson Elementary School's Media Center. A rush of energy, in the form of energetic whispers, is released into the library where themed tables are covered with books. Right now, it's all about reading, at the annual Scholastic Book Fair held Thursday and Friday, Feb. 2 and 3.

Linda Haley, who coordinates the book fair, knows the importance of promoting fun reading for children.

"The whole point of the book fair is to promote reading, and to promote kids loving books," said Haley. "Because if they can read, they can do anything. Reading is the basis for it all."

The book fair offered books for pre-kindergarten students through sixth-grade, ranging in price from $2 - $5 dollars. The students brought an envelope with cash to their teacher, and the book fair volunteers took care of the rest.

"We ask parents to give as much money as they want to spend," said Haley. "It's a great way to get inexpensive books into the hands of kids and get them reading."

From start to finish, it takes Haley about two months to organize the book fair. She says the only difficulty is the time it takes for the ordered books to arrive on station, and the school's PTO organization.

"We hope we can get more parents will get involved with the PTO, so we can push for a bigger budget," said Haley.

"This year was such a success, we hope not only to repeat it, but to do even better next year," said Haley.

Julie Ellis, a parent and book fair volunteer, feels strongly about doing her part to get kids to enjoy reading.

"I think getting children involved is one the best things you can do. It's a foundation," said Ellis. "The more they like

Giant Anoles are the kings of the anoles

By Paul Schoenfeld, Natural Resources Manager

The Giant Anole (Anolis smallwoodi) is the largest anole, a member of the group of the iguanid lizards representing 62 species in Cuba. It is bright green with a series of yellow-gold spots forming a striped appearance all over the body. The dewlap (throat-pouch) is pink.

Also called crown supergiants because they live primarily in tree tops, Giant Anoles can get up to 8 inches long, not counting the tail. The tail can be two-thirds the animal's total length, making these anoles up to 24 inches long.

The anole tail is an interesting adaptation for survival. It is prehensile, meaning it is used like an extra hand for hanging on to things, and, as an extension of the spine, it is strong. But the most interesting aspect of the tail is that anoles can drop it, almost at will, and then grow a new one.

When an anole is attacked by a predator, it can drop its tail. The tail wiggles and flops around drawing the predator's attention away from the anole, allowing it to escape to cover unharmed. The anole then grows a new tail but it's not the same as the first one. It does not have the same prehensile abilities or even the same coloration, but it can be dropped again in an attempt to escape from danger.

Anoles have other interesting adaptations for survival. The toe pads have a long finger with a long claw at the end which is used for holding on to rough surfaces such as bark and limbs.

The underside of the toe pad has a series of ridges called lamellae for holding on to smooth surfaces. The lamellae have a series of minute scales allowing the anole to grip slick surfaces of leaves or even glass.

Anoles also have a third eye on top of their head complete with retinal nerves connecting to the brain. This third eye is not used for vision like the other eyes but it does detect light. It is used to determine the amount of sunlight received for regulating body temperature.

Giant Anoles are the kings of the anoles. They have a massive head with powerful jaws and are aggressive. Although they eat a variety of plants, they are hunters and are known to prey upon birds, small mammals, insects, and also smaller anoles. They are territorial and defend their tree canopy against other giant anoles and will even leave the tree to fight on the ground.

Giant Anoles are fairly common and populations appear to sistent with the global shift of trade and transport."

Accordingly, the report says the Navy will maintain at least six "operationally available and sustainable carriers" and 60 percent of its submarines in the Pacific to support engagement, presence and deterrence missions.

"The emphasis on the Pacific is one that is really important for our future," said Mullen. In that ocean, "you are talking about something we call the tyranny of distance. It takes a long time to get places, so positioning our capabilities at this particular point in time is a really important strategic move in order to meet [the challenges] in this future security environment."

Mullen was quick to point out that all these decisions speak to the unique and powerful capabilities the Navy delivers for the Joint Force.

"The QDR endorses a larger fleet," he noted. But it "is clearly a Fleet that is going to be more lethal and more capable across a full spectrum of capabilities."

So, as the service brings these and other new programs online, he said it is important to remember that they represent a "broad range of new capabilities that are very important for the future."

"We are first and foremost a warfighting, seagoing service,"

Mullen reminded his audience. "In that regard we have to cover this full spectrum of missions, everything from humanitarian assistance and disaster relief through major combat operations."

Of all the things the new review endorses, however, Mullen said he thinks the most important one is people.

"The QDR will be lots of things to lots of people, but most importantly it will be about you, our Sailors and clearly the Marines, Soldiers and Airmen in the other services. What it endeavors to do is to put into your hands what you need to engage in the future."

be stable. Natural predators include the Great Lizard Cuckoo and various birds of prey, but the real threat to these and other iguanid lizards is excessive predation by feral house-cats and chickens.
