Looking Back

The prerogatives of the House of Assembly and the Cabinet of the Governor-General of the British West Indies, which was abolished in December 1959, are under review by the National Unity Development Association. The British Government has said it will consider the possibility of a constitutional conference to find a solution to the colonial problem.

The number of Barbadian scholarships has increased, as has the number of students who have been given to the University of the West Indies. The Government has also been able to introduce an educational policy, which is proving to be successful.

The Constitution of the Republic of Barbados is likely to be approved in the near future. The Government is also working on the implementation of the Legislature.

In Barbados, the UPA (United Party for Advancement) has won the elections of 1948. The elections of that year gave the UPA a majority. No means to halt the progress of the UPA have been devised; the educational policy to be followed by the UPA may be well-founded.
