The Shadow of Germany On The Voting Paper

By WILLIAM SABRELL, Editor of the Daily Telegraph

The latest issue of the German periodical "The Economist" contains a most interesting article on the political situation in Germany. The author, Dr. Hermann von Bülow, who is well-known for his pro-German views, expresses his belief that the German people are becoming increasingly disillusioned with their current political leaders. He argues that the government is not doing enough to ensure peace and prosperity for the nation.

Bülow's article is particularly noteworthy because it provides a rare glimpse into the thoughts of a leading political figure in a country that has traditionally been regarded as stable and peaceful. His views are likely to be influential, as they reflect the sentiments of many Germans who are dissatisfied with the current state of affairs.

The article also contains a section on the recent elections in Germany, which were held on September 28th. Bülow notes that the results were disappointing for the Christian Democratic Union (CDU), which lost several seats in the Bundestag. He attributes this to the party's failure to address the economic problems facing the country.

In conclusion, Bülow's article serves as a reminder of the importance of democratic institutions and the need for political leaders to be accountable to their constituents. It also highlights the challenges facing Germany as it seeks to emerge from the scars of war and rebuild its economy.
