Captain William Fly

"Enlightened" by the British, Fly originally held the rank of navigator, but later became the captain of the Thomas Green. After being captured by the press-gang, he decided to join them and served as the master of a ship. After the ship was sighted by Green, Fly and his crew deserted to the press gang, causing the Thomas Green to be sailed by the press gang to the Guinea Coast.

According to the Rev. Cotton, Fly refused knowing his trade and rectified his past actions. Fly was soon to follow after being captured by the press gang. The mate was soon to follow after being captured by the press gang. The captain hoisted a flag over the ship, indicating that the ship was the property of the British. This action was approved by the British authorities, and the ship was seized.

For the next three years, Fly and his crew were held in the press gang, and the ship was used as a spectacle for the press gang. The ship was later sold to the Guinea Coast, and the crew was released. Fly and many of his fellow crewmen grew to hate Captain John Gale, and he was eventually murdered both by the press gang and by the members of the ship.

Gradually he worked his way through the ranks, and after the death of the previous captain, he was elected as the captain of the ship. He worked hard to ensure that the ship was properly maintained and that the crew was well taken care of.

Gradually he worked his way through the ranks, and after the death of the previous captain, he was elected as the captain of the ship. He worked hard to ensure that the ship was properly maintained and that the crew was well taken care of.

Gradually he worked his way through the ranks, and after the death of the previous captain, he was elected as the captain of the ship. He worked hard to ensure that the ship was properly maintained and that the crew was well taken care of.

Gradually he worked his way through the ranks, and after the death of the previous captain, he was elected as the captain of the ship. He worked hard to ensure that the ship was properly maintained and that the crew was well taken care of.