A FEZUELARY

The current state of naval war affairs has been most nearly described in the South as "the war to the hilt." This is only a fair description of the situation in the South, but it does not convey the full sense of the situation. The war has been going on for several years, and the lives and property of the people have been suffering. The South is determined to fight to the bitter end, and the North is determined to bring the war to a successful conclusion.

The South has been able to carry on the war successfully, but it has not been able to carry on the war as successfully as it would have liked. The North has been able to carry on the war successfully, but it has not been able to carry on the war as successfully as it would have liked.

The South is determined to fight to the hilt, and the North is determined to bring the war to a successful conclusion. The South has been able to carry on the war successfully, but it has not been able to carry on the war as successfully as it would have liked. The North has been able to carry on the war successfully, but it has not been able to carry on the war as successfully as it would have liked.

The South is determined to fight to the hilt, and the North is determined to bring the war to a successful conclusion. The South has been able to carry on the war successfully, but it has not been able to carry on the war as successfully as it would have liked. The North has been able to carry on the war successfully, but it has not been able to carry on the war as successfully as it would have liked.

The South is determined to fight to the hilt, and the North is determined to bring the war to a successful conclusion. The South has been able to carry on the war successfully, but it has not been able to carry on the war as successfully as it would have liked. The North has been able to carry on the war successfully, but it has not been able to carry on the war as successfully as it would have liked.