ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

I would like to thank the members of my dissertation committee, Alan G. Sawyer, Joseph W. Alba, and Chris Janiszewski for their patience and guidance throughout this process. Thanks also to Karl Hackenbrack for his participation. I am greatly indebted to Dr. Joel Cohen for his assistance during the initial phases of the dissertation and for his continued guidance regarding regulatory issues. I would also like to thank Dr. Bart Weitz for his support and encouragement, and Dr. John G. Lynch for initiating me into the doctoral program.

I must acknowledge several people who influenced my thinking about the rewards of an academic life. First, I would like to thank my mentor, Dr. Harmon M. Hosch, without whom I would have never thought of research as a creative outlet and academia as a desirable career. Thanks also to Dr. Gary Sullivan, who made it so interesting to think about what goes on “above the neck and between the ears” of consumers, and who was instrumental in shaping my decision to attend the University of Florida program. The words of Dr. David Hall and Dr. Lawrence Johnson still guide many of my career decisions. Their call to think critically and scrutinize the impact of business and media practices on society will continue to influence my research interests.

I must also thank those people who made the journey more exciting and challenging, as well as comforting and fun. Thanks to Keith Pannell, Carol Nijbroek, and Mayo de Juan Vigaray for their unwavering friendship and support. Their love and
