

I don't wonder that Miss Hayward forgot, because she had to think so much of her sister; but if I had reminded her, seeing others in sorrow perhaps might have made her forget her own sorrow a little, and giving comfort to them might have comforted her.

We were to have gone to-morrow with Tiny and a cart to gather large stones, to build the rock-work in Amy's garden. This will be a very hard punishment to give myself, but will be a very good one. I will ask Miss Hayward not to let me go for the stones to-morrow, but to come with me to some of the cottages.

Ah! if I had remembered what Mamma told me, and what I know so well myself I ought to have done, I need not have been obliged to give up the rock-work; and now, perhaps, I
