

terminated to do. But she said, Don't say a word, don't tell me. I know your decision. I have found it out by your looks. I know if my own little Fanny had resolved to do her own pleasure, instead of her duty, she could never look so happy and contented, as she does at this moment. Am I not right? I told Miss Hayward that she was quite right, and that I was very sorry that I had not seen, or rather not done at once what I ought to do. For I did see it, and at first I was quite determined, but then I began to think of Amy's disappointment, and my own disappointment, and that made me wish to escape it, and to take my own way, instead of the right way.

Well, dear Mamma, when all our lessons were finished, away we went, and one after
