

stand what it is we have to do, for a great many of us, he says, hear and read that question, without thinking much about it.

I will try and remember his own words as much as I can. With how many of us, he said, this is the case. How many of us sleep on and dream, when we should awake and work. We cannot be made to feel or understand our own danger. God warns us perhaps a great many times, but we will not be warned. His great goodness is not thought of. His great power is forgotten. His great mercy is despised. The heart remains hard, the soul grows more careless, and we live as if we had no God to serve, no judgment to fear, no account to give, no soul to save.

Then he went to the other side; and said,
