

his wives and children, and flocks and herds, and great wealth, as much as he could wish for; and, besides all this, found his brother, whom he had so great reason to fear, ready to be friends with him, I began thinking how happy and how grateful he must have felt. And when she came to the verse where Jacob says, "God hath dealt graciously with me, and I have enough;" or, as Miss Hayward said, it meant, "I have all things," I almost fancied that a real voice said quite close to me, "God has dealt graciously with you, Fanny; you, too, have enough, for you have all things." Surely, Mamma, God has given me all things, for I cannot think of any one thing that I want. I have you, dear Papa and Mamma, and now God has sent little Amy; and I have
