

THE LITTLE NAIL-MAKER.

brothers and sisters,—when there is no quarrelling nor fighting that one may get more nice things than another.

Well, that is just the sort of feeling we ought to have towards every body. We are all God's family; and we should not think that, because we know more, and possess more valuable things than others, that we are better than they; or that, because they are strangers, we need not concern ourselves about them. But we should ever study to help them and to make them happy, as we would do if they were, in the common sense, our brothers and sisters.

We are now going to tell a story about a poor little English boy that Mr. Burritt met with over here, four or five years ago, and what he did to help him—and how the little boys and girls in America shewed that they understood and felt the principles of Universal Brotherhood. And perhaps it will induce some of our dear little readers to act in a similar manner, when any opportunity for doing good shall occur,
