Whiskey Wives Won Fight
in Bristol, Va., by 32 Votes

Bristol, Va., July 8—By the narrow margin of 32 votes of a total of 900 votes polled the anti-prohibition vote won the local option election held here yesterday, following one of the most costly and best managed campaigns of its kind in the South.

Pandemonium reigned here last night after the polls closed and the votes were counted in the town hall as the fires were lit in the smoldering city of Bristol in Tennessee, as well as in Bristol, Va., which had declared for the sale of liquor under the old law.

Preparations are all ready being made for opening saloons and wholesale houses for supplying the thousands of dollars.

The rally was held at the half-mile point of Price Station, which was then the nearest point of town.

The campaign was a little more than a month ago, Judge John W. Price, of the corporation court, was elected to the court, and he was the candidate of the successful ticket.

Half of the business buildings in the city were on fire and the firemen were called out to put out the flames and to protect the buildings.

The second section of the argument was made to the people who were given the chance of voting on the local option.

The second section also made to the people who were given the chance of voting on the local option.

The third section of the argument was made to the people who were given the chance of voting on the local option.

The fourth section of the argument was made to the people who were given the chance of voting on the local option.

The authors have made a deliberate effort to make the text difficult to read, but the meaning is clear. The main points are:

1. The campaign was a little more than a month ago, and Judge John W. Price was elected to the court.
2. Half of the business buildings in the city were on fire.
3. The firemen were called out to put out the flames.
4. The campaign was a deliberate effort to make the text difficult to read, but the meaning is clear.
