WASHINGION — The Democratic National Convention, which is opening this evening, is the first of two political conventions that could be the most important in the 21st century. After Senator John F. Kennedy’s landmark 1960 convention, which made him the first Catholic and the first young senator to secure the nomination for president, the 2020 convention will be the first that is not held in a state where Hispanics make up over 50% of the electorate.

The convention will be held entirely online, with delegates, speakers, and the nominees making appearances from various locations. The convention is expected to feature a mix of virtual and in-person events, with some delegates attending in person and others participating virtually.

The convention will run from August 17 to 20, and will include a series of speeches and debates, as well as a series of events to celebrate the Democratic Party and its candidates.

The convention is expected to attract millions of viewers, with media coverage from around the world.

The convention will be a major milestone in the presidential campaign, as the nominees will formally accept their party’s nomination for president and vice president.

The convention will also feature a series of speeches by prominent figures, including former presidents Barack Obama and Bill Clinton, former first lady Michelle Obama, and several members of Congress.

The Democratic National Convention is expected to be a major event in the presidential campaign, and will be closely watched by both the public and the media.

The convention will be held in Milwaukee, Wisconsin, and will feature a range of events, including speeches, debates, and musical performances.

The convention is expected to attract millions of viewers, with media coverage from around the world.

The convention will be a major milestone in the presidential campaign, as the nominees will formally accept their party’s nomination for president and vice president.

The convention will also feature a series of speeches by prominent figures, including former presidents Barack Obama and Bill Clinton, former first lady Michelle Obama, and several members of Congress.

The Democratic National Convention is expected to be a major event in the presidential campaign, and will be closely watched by both the public and the media.