“Have gathered from the Alto, going to the pineapple bushes about the square a smashable quality of living andopolis charm.” — William Faulkner

So much of the world’s news was shared, problems were solved, voices were raised in the songs of both sides. I think of the “faidful” in my Graham Bullard’s house in White Springs. It was screened and also served as a “sleeping porch.” Cots and day beds were pulled from the south side of the house and onto the front porch.

Well, this may be one of the best articles I have ever read, or at least in my opinion. The writer has managed to capture the essence of the old times in a way that is both nostalgic and informative. The description of the porch and the surrounding yard is vivid and descriptive, bringing to mind images of simpler times.

The writer mentions the “screened sleeping porches,” which were a common feature of southern homes. These porches were not only a place to sleep, but also a place to socialize and enjoy the outdoors. The description of the porch is reminiscent of the ones that were once common in many homes. It also brings to mind images of people sitting and talking, while enjoying the comfortable and peaceful atmosphere.

The writer also mentions the “summer months,” which are a time of year that is highly anticipated in the southern states. The description of the porch is a reminder of the pleasant weather and the enjoyable activities that can be done during this time. The writer captures the essence of the southern way of life and the traditions that have been passed down through generations.

Overall, the article is a beautiful tribute to the past and a reminder of the importance of maintaining our connections to the past. The writer’s use of imagery and descriptive language is a testament to their skill in capturing the essence of a place and a time.
