

It is this note of change that is causing the ferment in our educational system today.

The college level student today was not raised & educated in the relatively stable society of over a decade ago.

He is now conscious of change because change -- the fourth dimension -- has been the pattern of his life in a way it never was with other generations. So he is impelled to be about the business of changing the educational system -- and the society of which he is a part.

He is not wrong in trying to seek change.

There can be no growth without change. If all the American promises more is more gold -- then the commitment to opportunity for growth.

But he is wrong when he attempts to insure the change he thinks desirable by riding violently and destructively over the cultural progress of the past.

There can be but one underlying rule in the college of this land, and that is the rule of reason. It demands that college administration listen to their youth, and regard with reason. It demands that youth acknowledge that reason is the only valid approach to change, and that force does not -- and cannot be permitted -- to be used as a substitute.

That administrator who cannot force change will meet ruin.

That student who cannot accept the rule of reason forfeits his right to influence guide the change.
