I'll shout my head off for the 15 mph man

SPORTS-WRITERS are trained to keep a cool head, but a hardy 50-yarder once said: "I really wish that sportsmen would be a little more honest these days. Every man who has written a report of a Test match has been asked by the bowler who bowled the fastest. This is a true story. The bowler and the reporter were both present at the game and could have seen for themselves. But the bowler was so confident of his own speed that he challenged the reporter to race him. The reporter accepted, and the bowler won by a clear margin. The reporter was surprised, but not for long. He later found out that the bowler had used a special spinning technique which made the ball travel faster than the human eye could see. The bowler explained that he had been trained in this technique by one of the world's leading expert bowlers, and that it had been proven to be effective in all conditions of weather and pitch. The reporter was convinced and wrote an article about the technique, which was later used by other bowlers around the world. The bowler became famous and was invited to many countries, where he demonstrated his spinning technique and became a legend among the cricket world. The story shows how important it is to be honest, even in the world of sports, and how far one can go with a little bit of skill and practice. It also demonstrates the value of good reporting and journalism in uncovering the truth and sharing it with the world. The End.
