PUBLIC MARKET

The Public Market has been a bone of contention for many years. Today, in a condition of most unsatisfactory. The area in which it is not used for storing run has been a constant source of complaint. Although such a market has been provided, the area is not used for its intended purpose. The market bustles of commerce, but it is not the place it should be. It is a place where people can buy and sell goods, not where they can store run.

The former Superintendent made recommendations for the improvement of the Market, but these were never carried out, and the last condition of the market has become worse since then.

Some weeks ago the market was surveyed and plans were made for its improvement. It was decided to widen the area and to construct a wall around it to keep out the cattle. It was also decided to provide a proper drainage system to prevent the area from becoming waterlogged.

Now, after all these years of neglect, the market is finally being improved. The people of the city are looking forward to its improvement, and they will do all they can to see that it is carried out in a satisfactory manner.

A Clear Case Of Unprintable Language

BY BEVERLY BAXTER

One of the most fascinating things about language is its ability to express a wide range of emotions and ideas. However, there are certain words in the English language that are considered unprintable. These words are often used to express strong emotions, such as anger or frustration, or to describe offensive or insulting behavior.

For example, the word "fuck" is considered unprintable in many countries, and it is often replaced with a more礼貌的说法, such as "damn" or "gosh." Similarly, the word "shit" is also considered unprintable, and it is often replaced with "heck" or "golly."

However, these words are often used in informal conversation, and it is not uncommon to hear them being used in everyday speech. In fact, they are often used to express strong emotions, such as anger or frustration, or to describe offensive or insulting behavior.

One of the most fascinating things about language is its ability to express a wide range of emotions and ideas. However, there are certain words in the English language that are considered unprintable. These words are often used to express strong emotions, such as anger or frustration, or to describe offensive or insulting behavior.

For example, the word "fuck" is considered unprintable in many countries, and it is often replaced with a more礼貌的说法, such as "damn" or "gosh." Similarly, the word "shit" is also considered unprintable, and it is often replaced with "heck" or "golly."

However, these words are often used in informal conversation, and it is not uncommon to hear them being used in everyday speech. In fact, they are often used to express strong emotions, such as anger or frustration, or to describe offensive or insulting behavior.

One of the most fascinating things about language is its ability to express a wide range of emotions and ideas. However, there are certain words in the English language that are considered unprintable. These words are often used to express strong emotions, such as anger or frustration, or to describe offensive or insulting behavior.

For example, the word "fuck" is considered unprintable in many countries, and it is often replaced with a more礼貌的说法, such as "damn" or "gosh." Similarly, the word "shit" is also considered unprintable, and it is often replaced with "heck" or "golly."

However, these words are often used in informal conversation, and it is not uncommon to hear them being used in everyday speech. In fact, they are often used to express strong emotions, such as anger or frustration, or to describe offensive or insulting behavior.