U.C.W.I. STUDY GROUP START COURSE

DISCUSS FAMILY'S SOCIAL SIGNIFICANCE

An audience of 80 heard Miss Batey introduce the University College Study Group on "Family and the Parent" and the Teacher at Barbados Council, Waterford yesterday. The Study Group, which will be followed by a second, is designed to accumulate knowledge in preparation for further research in the area of family and the humanities. Miss Batey's subject was "The Social Significance of the Family."”

Miss Batey began by stating that the human infant needs family for survival. The family protects the child from the hazards of the world, giving him a sense of security and love which is essential to his emotional and physical development. The family also provides a base for the child's social development, teaching him the norms of society and helping him to develop a sense of identity.

The family is a basic social unit, providing a framework for the individual's socialization and development. It is within the family that the child learns the values and norms of society, and develops a sense of belonging and identity. The family is also the primary source of emotional support and security, providing a safe and nurturing environment for the child to grow and develop.

In many ways, the family is the cornerstone of society, providing a foundation for the individual's social and emotional well-being. It is within the family that the individual learns the skills and values necessary to become a productive member of society. The family is therefore a vital social institution, providing a framework for the individual's socialization and development, and serving as a source of emotional support and security.

The family is also an important economic institution, providing a framework for the individual's financial stability and security. It is within the family that the individual learns the skills and values necessary to become a productive member of society. The family is therefore a vital social institution, providing a framework for the individual's socialization and development, and serving as a source of emotional support and security.

The family is also an important economic institution, providing a framework for the individual's financial stability and security. It is within the family that the individual learns the skills and values necessary to become a productive member of society. The family is therefore a vital social institution, providing a framework for the individual's socialization and development, and serving as a source of emotional support and security.

The family is also an important economic institution, providing a framework for the individual's financial stability and security. It is within the family that the individual learns the skills and values necessary to become a productive member of society. The family is therefore a vital social institution, providing a framework for the individual's socialization and development, and serving as a source of emotional support and security.

The family is also an important economic institution, providing a framework for the individual's financial stability and security. It is within the family that the individual learns the skills and values necessary to become a productive member of society. The family is therefore a vital social institution, providing a framework for the individual's socialization and development, and serving as a source of emotional support and security.

The family is also an important economic institution, providing a framework for the individual's financial stability and security. It is within the family that the individual learns the skills and values necessary to become a productive member of society. The family is therefore a vital social institution, providing a framework for the individual's socialization and development, and serving as a source of emotional support and security.

The family is also an important economic institution, providing a framework for the individual's financial stability and security. It is within the family that the individual learns the skills and values necessary to become a productive member of society. The family is therefore a vital social institution, providing a framework for the individual's socialization and development, and serving as a source of emotional support and security.

The family is also an important economic institution, providing a framework for the individual's financial stability and security. It is within the family that the individual learns the skills and values necessary to become a productive member of society. The family is therefore a vital social institution, providing a framework for the individual's socialization and development, and serving as a source of emotional support and security.

The family is also an important economic institution, providing a framework for the individual's financial stability and security. It is within the family that the individual learns the skills and values necessary to become a productive member of society. The family is therefore a vital social institution, providing a framework for the individual's socialization and development, and serving as a source of emotional support and security.

The family is also an important economic institution, providing a framework for the individual's financial stability and security. It is within the family that the individual learns the skills and values necessary to become a productive member of society. The family is therefore a vital social institution, providing a framework for the individual's socialization and development, and serving as a source of emotional support and security.

The family is also an important economic institution, providing a framework for the individual's financial stability and security. It is within the family that the individual learns the skills and values necessary to become a productive member of society. The family is therefore a vital social institution, providing a framework for the individual's socialization and development, and serving as a source of emotional support and security.

The family is also an important economic institution, providing a framework for the individual's financial stability and security. It is within the family that the individual learns the skills and values necessary to become a productive member of society. The family is therefore a vital social institution, providing a framework for the individual's socialization and development, and serving as a source of emotional support and security.

The family is also an important economic institution, providing a framework for the individual's financial stability and security. It is within the family that the individual learns the skills and values necessary to become a productive member of society. The family is therefore a vital social institution, providing a framework for the individual's socialization and development, and serving as a source of emotional support and security.

The family is also an important economic institution, providing a framework for the individual's financial stability and security. It is within the family that the individual learns the skills and values necessary to become a productive member of society. The family is therefore a vital social institution, providing a framework for the individual's socialization and development, and serving as a source of emotional support and security.

The family is also an important economic institution, providing a framework for the individual's financial stability and security. It is within the family that the individual learns the skills and values necessary to become a productive member of society. The family is therefore a vital social institution, providing a framework for the individual's socialization and development, and serving as a source of emotional support and security.

The family is also an important economic institution, providing a framework for the individual's financial stability and security. It is within the family that the individual learns the skills and values necessary to become a productive member of society. The family is therefore a vital social institution, providing a framework for the individual's socialization and development, and serving as a source of emotional support and security.

The family is also an important economic institution, providing a framework for the individual's financial stability and security. It is within the family that the individual learns the skills and values necessary to become a productive member of society. The family is therefore a vital social institution, providing a framework for the individual's socialization and development, and serving as a source of emotional support and security.

The family is also an important economic institution, providing a framework for the individual's financial stability and security. It is within the family that the individual learns the skills and values necessary to become a productive member of society. The family is therefore a vital social institution, providing a framework for the individual's socialization and development, and serving as a source of emotional support and security.